

Wimbledon College of Arts Blog

MFA graduate Chris Agnew to have solo booth at London Art Fair 2017

JANUARY 13, 2017 • BY SOPHIE KASSAY • NO COMMENTS

MFA Fine Art 2010 graduate Chris Agnew will have a solo booth at this year's London Art Fair from 18 – 22 January 2017 at the Business Design Centre in Islington.

We interviewed Chris to find out more about his upcoming show, his signature icon panel etc and the differences in being an artist in London and Romania, where he has lived for the past

Can you tell us about your upcoming show at London Art Fair?

I made the decision with my gallery, Kristin Hjellegjerde Gallery, to treat the space as I would show with a really strong focus. This new series of drawings, 'Ba da, Dodă' takes Constantin modernist sculpture, the 'Infinity Column' and plays it out as a socialist apartment block. I'm in how abstract ideological forms or structures are manifest in the physical world around us. apartment blocks that still dominate the Romanian landscape, where I've been for the last five stand as a symbol of the country's communist past, but I ask the question: what if a population inhabit another ideological form?

The column reveals some surprising interventions: apartments in all states of dilapidation and renovation, monolithic black stones, flags ravaged by the wind – all alluding to the mysticism out of the cracks of rigid ideology.

'Ba da, Dodă' translates roughly as 'of course, dear sister'. Dodă, Dodă was a popular Romanian song famously recorded by the singer Maria Tanase, whom Brancuși was alleged to maybe in love with. The song is about finding new company in a new place, and being willing to make sacrifice in order to stay there regardless of whether it's 'good' for you or not.

The booth will also feature a floor etching – a charred parquet floor inlaid with brass, reflecting a motif that I've used in my works for a few years now. This will be the first occasion on which I together various strands of my output; my background in interior design and furniture restoration in Romania, scenography for TV in England, and my Icon Panel Etchings.

What's it like living and working as an artist in Romania? What are some of the differences between the art scene there and in London?

Before I left London, I was working full-time in a gallery whilst renting a studio in a big warehouse in Bermondsey, and despite having had a great year of shows and awards, the atmosphere was quite heavily. I moved to Bucharest, and the clouds lifted. There were no expectations of work I should be producing, I could just work, and really forge my own path. The friction between the two cities has led to a great creativity. The art scene in Bucharest is arguably not as developed as in the city of London. Romanian painters like Adrian Ghenie studied, but in the five years I've lived there I've observed the scene really grown. It is a place where the unexpected is still unexpected, whereas in London I can't help but feel like the unexpected is now expected. There are some galleries doing some really interesting things in Bucharest, like Zorzini Gallery, which takes some great young emerging artists to fairs across Europe.

If London continues to make it harder for artists, musicians, writers to live and work in the city, then there we're going to see more of them leaving for other European cities.

Can you describe your artistic practice? How has it changed and developed since graduating?

Put simply, my work considers how ideology takes form and operates in the world around us through art, architecture, literature, conspiracy theories etc. I normally find a subject to fixate on and obsess over, researching every last nook and cranny, scraping back the layers, and building it back up to tell the story I want to tell. I take an idea for a walk and see if it's got legs. Sometimes it can take a while to get started on a particular project until I feel like the time is right.

My work normally takes the form of highly detailed drawings, and my signature technique of fine line etchings; I engrave directly into the surface of gesso panels traditionally used for orthodox iconography.

paintings, and apply a layer of black oil paint, wiping off the remainder as you would with an eraser on a white plate, in order to reveal the image underneath. With some of the works, I make colourful interventions on the surface and watch as some sort of conversation takes place.

Since graduating my work has found a conceptual and material consistency whilst simultaneously being open to embracing other areas of interest, such as film, interior design, and writing.

Charred parquet floor inlaid with brass that will feature at Chris' booth

What would you say have been your most notable achievements since graduating with your MFA Fine Art?

Having my work acquired by collections like the V&A and the Hearst Corporation have been major milestones, but building a strong relationship with my gallery has been such a great ride. Not only for professional reasons but also because there is a great family of artists and writers connected to the gallery, and we all support and feed off each other (metaphorically and literally). When you finish your degree, establishing a creative network can be quite difficult, especially if you are trying to nurture relationships from 2000 miles away.

What did you enjoy most about studying the MFA Fine Art at Wimbledon?

The people. I was encouraged to push my practice in so many different directions, not just by my mentors but by my friends in the studio. I ended up trying to see how far down the rabbit-hole went on various occasions. For example, for my final project 'The view from the end', I started researching apocalyptic theories as 2012 was approaching. I started using online forums used by apocalypse fanatics and participated in various discussions.

I ended up striking up a conversation with a Canadian Archaeoastronomer who believed that he had found a 150ft carving of the Mayan Sun God on a remote island 600km off the coast of Chile.

calculated that from that position, one would be able to witness the solar eclipse that would end of the Mayan Calendar, which many associated with the end of the world. He invited me to the island with him to witness the eclipse, and this is what I based my final project on. Everyone was telling me that I was mad, but that I should see where the story led me, so that's what I did.

Ba Da Dodă, Water Tower by Chris Agnew

What else do you have coming up?

I have work in a big group show called 'Everything Exists Now', which opened on 7 January at Hjellegjerde Gallery. I'm also starting a residency in the spring of this year with Casa Jurnalistică Bucharest, a house of independent journalists which investigates various social issues in Eastern Europe. I bought an antique writing desk at a flea market in Bucharest some years ago, and the man who sold it to me said that the key had been snapped off in the lock, and whatever was inside was to be kept. It contained letters, official documents, photos etc, all from the same family from between 1945 and 1985 – the latter just a few years before the revolution. The contents document all the tribulations of the family during that whole period of massive change. I've already made contact with a member of the family, and working with Casa Jurnalistică, we're going to see how far the research goes.

Chris Agnew's solo booth will be at the London Art Fair from 18 – 22 January. Find out more about Chris and his work by visiting his website and following him on Instagram.

Learn more about studying MFA Fine Art at Wimbledon College of Arts.

CHRIS AGNEW

LONDON ART FAIR

LONDON ART FAIR 2017

MFA

MFA FINE ART

ALUMNI, EVENTS, EXHIBITIONS, FINE ART, INTERVIEWS, MFA FINE ART,

Comments are closed.

RELATED POSTS

MFA GRADUATE ANA MILENKOVIC
WINS 2016 GRIFFIN ART PRIZE

December 7, 2016

MFA FINE ART GRADUATE JAMES
REYNOLDS IS SHORTLISTED FOR
THE 2016 GRADUATE ART PRIZE

September 20, 2016

MEET A FINAL YEAR STUDENT
DIMITRI YIN, MFA FINE ART

June 29, 2016

« PREVIOUS POST

NATALIE WEARDEN – METRESQUARE

MA PAINTING GRADUATE STEVEN ING

YOUNG CONTEMPORARY TALENT

CONTACT US

Wimbledon College of Arts

Merton Hall Road

London SW19 3QA

Find us

+44 (0)20 7514 9641

View all contacts

